Expect Shad Catches To Increase In About A Week

About one more week of good weather and the shad fishing season along the upper Delaware River will be under way. Small hauls of four and five were made Tuesday. The largest haul so far this year at the Lewis Fishery, on the New Jersey side and Lambertville, numbered 42 last Monday. Four and five in a haul were pulled out this morning.

The shad are averaging five and six pounds apiece, but the water is too high right now to result in large hauls.

Veterans are looking forward to a bigger season than usual because of the fact dredging of the Delaware in the Trenton sector has been stopped. Fishermen are of the opinion that since the dredge has been removed more shad will reach the upper Delaware sections.

Paris, April 22—Important military and naval conversations between high French and British officials will be held shortly, International News Service ascertained today, despite the reluctance of French authorities to discuss the matter.

The tight lipped attitude of Paris officials was attributed to their desire to say nothing which might throw a hitch into the negotiations at Rome for an Italo-French agreement to supplement the recently-concluded Anglo-Italian pact.

Anglo-French defense collaboration will be among the most important topics discussed in London next week it was learned.

Eddington Residents See Deer Grazing in Field

MUST REGISTER DEEDS IN MORRISVILLE BORO'

Ordinance Passed By Council
Is Approved by Burgess
And Becomes A Law

HAVE BOROUGH ATLAS

MORRISVILLE, Apr. 22—Borough Council has passed and Burgess William J. Burgess, Jr., has signed an ordinance calling for the registration of all deeds for property to be made with the borough engineer's office.

The borough, through a WPA project, compiled a borough atlas showing the location, size and owner of every piece of property in the borough. It will now be necessary to have a borough stamp on every deed before a transfer can be made and recorded at the county seat. The county authorities are prohibited from recording any deed unless it has been registered in the office of the Morrisville engineer. In this manner the borough will always have the correct owner of every parcel of property in the borough.

The borough atlas will be beneficial in many other ways, aside from the registration of deeds, as it contains much additional valuable information for the use of the municipal officers.

Where's The Difference?

Washington, April 21. THE old saying about people who strain at a gnat but can swallow a camel may not exactly fit a certain Washington situation, but it is at least called to mind by the swift punishment inflicted upon Mr. Horace Russell, the thrifty, letter-writing general counsel of the HOLC, as contrasted to the smiling secretary son, James Roosevelt, pursues his lucrative insurance way.

MR. RUSSELL, it developed, while holding a minor Government post, sent out franked letters highly commending a former member of the HOLC legal staff who had resigned to practice law in Washington. The charge was made on the floor of the House that this "scandalous and disgraceful" that it in effect was an announcement of the partnership of Mr. Russell with the other lawyer; that it was a deliberate use of governmental position and influence to make money. Democrats as well as Republicans took this view.

AS SOON as the facts were called to the attention of Mr. John E. Fahey, head of the HOLC, there was prompt action. The HOLC is one of the cleanest and most competently conducted of the New Deal agencies and Mr. Fahey left no doubt as to his view of such practices. Mr. Russell's resignation was immediately announced and he stepped out of his position under a heavy fire of criticism and disapproval. With no desire to minimize the impropriety of Mr. Russell's conduct, it is none the less a little difficult not to regard the indignation in his case and his summary dismissal as somewhat out of

CORNERSTONE OF "PENNSBURY" MANOR HOUSE IS PLACED AS STATE DIGNITARIES GATHER; GOVERNOR PLACES FIRST BRICK

400 Present for Ceremony, and Program of Addresses, at Historic Site Along the Delaware; Program Arranged By
Pa. Historical Society and General State Authority

(By Staff Correspondent)

PENNSBURY, Apr. 22—With Governor George H. Earle and other state dignitaries participating, the cornerstone of "Pennsbury" manor house, home of William Penn, which is in the course of restoration, was placed yesterday afternoon. Nine bricks were laid in position about a copper box containing souvenirs of the occasion and papers pertaining to the same. This ceremony following a program of addresses by men prominent in state affairs, historical groups, and the Society of Friends.

Flying here for the occasion, Governor Earle, after landing at a nearby airport, was escorted to a place of honor on the platform, which was decked in national colors, and from which flew to the breeze high above the Delaware, the American flag, and the banner of the Keystone state.

"We are standing upon historical grounds," the Governor said, after his introduction by the presiding officer, Major Frank W. Melvin, chairman of Pennsylvania Historical Commission. "This is the 300th anniversary year of Pennsylvania's civilization, and Pennsbury might well be considered the second capital of early Pennsylvania. It is our fervent desire that Pennsylvanians shall be enabled to gaze on the same type of buildings, and on the same scenery on which Penn gazed."

The chief executive told of how the plans for the restoration of Penn's manor house had been advanced, with those in charge feeling certain that such is being done with 95 per cent of accuracy. "When 'Pennsbury' is restored we can visualize better the site on which 19 important treaties with the Indians were signed. Let us therefore take fresh courage as we try to restore the attributes of a free people which are among Pennsylvania's traditions."

In paying tribute to those who have worked so diligently in order that this dream might be realized, Governor Earle reminded that "The higher one goes the harder the wind blows. This is true in politics, in aviation, and in being at the head of a great undertaking such as this. Some criticism has been hurled, but I am sure the work could not be in better hands, and Pennsylvania may well be proud of that which is now in formation on this historic site."

The program of the day was arranged by the Pennsylvania Historical Commission and the General State Authority.

The peaceful site which first attracted William Penn's attention as he made his way up the River Delaware over two centuries ago, was visited by approximately 400 people yesterday for the affair.

Other speakers of the occasion were: the presiding officer, Frank W. Melvin; William F. McGuire, public relations director of the General State Authority, who represented Col. Augustine S. Janeway; Dr. Clarence E. Ackley, of the Department of Public Instruction, Harrisburg, who took the place of Dr. Lester K. Ade, who was ill; Bruce A. Hunt, president of the Pennsylvania Federation of Historical Societies; Henry Paul Busch, president of the Welcome Society; William W. Comfort, president of Haverford College. The program was opened by silent invocation, under direction of the Philadelphia Yearly Meeting Religious Society of Friends, the Scripture reading being by James M. Moon, Morrisville.

Forty-nine societies have participated in order that the dream of a restored "Pennsbury" might be realized.

In his address, Mr. Melvin told of Penn's plans for his manor house, and of the security with which the foundations were placed. "We are here, however, because 'Pennsbury Manor' was much more than a manor house. Its ruler was a man of unusual power and vision. He used his rights to cultivate a vision of a great Democracy. His province in two generations became the most progressive and the richest of the 13 colonies along the Atlantic seaboard. The spiritual significance attached to 'Pennsbury' was referred to by the presiding officer, who told that the restoration had been contemplated for 19 years or more. "The best scholars and historians have given it their devoted attention," he added as he highly praised those who have led in the work, mentioning also the Warner Company, whose benefaction in the gift of the grounds is so deeply appreciated.

Mr. McGuire, representing Col. Janeway, paid tribute to the Pennsylvania Historical Commission for arranging yesterday's program and for the vast amount of work it and the General State Authority, and historical societies have done in connection with the project. "The important thing is not the amount of money that is being expended here, but the thought of the project and the giving of expression to it. 'Pennsbury' is being restored by those seven generations removed from Penn's time."

BAPTISM
EDDINGTON, Apr. 22—Robert Barnes VanSant, Jr., son of Mr. and Mrs. Robert B. VanSant, State Road, was baptized at the Sunday morning service in Christ Episcopal Church. The Rev. Arthur F. Gibson officiated. The baby's parents are Frank Harper and Early were sponsors.

Following this Mr. McGuire gave a summary of the "whyness" and the "whatness" of the General State Authority.

Others introduced to the representative gathering were: R. Brognard Okie, the architect, and Dr. Warren P. Laird, of the University of Pennsylvania.

"We rejoice that Pennsylvania not only has a splendid past, but a bright future," was one of the remarks of Bruce A. Hunt, president of the Pennsylvania Federation of Historical Societies. "What a man conceives in his mind when he sets about to build his home mirrors the man himself," he continued as he told of how Penn's character was reflected in the outlines for "Pennsbury." "William Penn did not plan to live here in effluence and ease, but he did show he appreciated the bounties which God had given him. More than brick, wood and mortar went into 'Pennsbury' manor house, for into it went part of Penn himself."

Henry Paul Busch, president of the Welcome Society, in representing the descendants of those who came over on the ship "Welcome," said that "Pennsbury" has through the years been a continuing and major enterprise of the Welcome Society, and we are glad to see the dreams nearing fruition." In referring to Penn's fine choice of a site for his home along the peaceful Delaware, Mr. Busch recalled that Penn had six liveried rowers for his barge which was anchored at "Pennsbury," in order that he might make the journey to his "City of Brotherly Love" by water at any time. Mr. Busch referred to the planting of the border of tulip trees at the historical plot, by Charles Henry Moon.

"We have visions of planting of more trees, and of the restoration of more buildings and of the garden also," he added. "And we hope for improvement of the appearance of the opposite shore."

The president of Haverford College, Dr. William H. Comfort, reminded his listeners that the State of Pennsylvania is the only one incorporating the name of its proprietor. The reasons for Penn's desire and pleasure in securing what is now Pennsylvania,

A Langhorne man, H. T. May, spoke on his travels in China and Japan when he addressed the Rotary Club in their regular weekly meeting yesterday afternoon in the Elks' Home. Frank Voit, president of the local service club presided. One visitor, H. J. Kendall, of the Morrisville Rotary club, was present. Ralph Powell was a guest.

May gave a detailed report of his travels in both China and Japan. He told of his trip in a cargo boat, and advised this method of travel because the cargo boats take considerable time at ports for unloading and loading, thus giving the passengers ample time to see the different ports.

Besides visiting most of the seaport towns in Japan, Mr. May also traveled extensively in China, visiting Shanghai, Hangchow, and other important cities. He attended a very interesting Chinese wedding while in that country. Many of the customs and peculiar manners of the Chinese people were discussed by Mr. May.

Talking about some of the conditions in Japan the speaker said that there are very few luxuries in that country. Practically everything is taxed, according to May. He told the Rotarians that many of the persons catch crickets and place them in boxes. Besides the crickets canaries are about the only form of amusement that is not taxed.

MORE FARMERS

Another back-to-the-land movement is reported by the Michigan Department of Agriculture. Last year there was a farm-to-city movement. The report says "there is a strong demand at the present time for small farms adjacent to the factories."

In the main this is not an agricultural problem except in its effect on the supply of farm labor. Last year there was a shortage of workers on the farm; this year probably quite a lot of the boys will want to help dad get in the spring crops. The farms always have acted as a buttress to the instability of city life.

Normally it would be expected that increasing the number of farmers and farm laborers would produce more foodstuffs, but the report says: "With the Government's various agricultural conservation programs in operation as a deterring factor, no material change in total acreage of spring-sown, soil depleting crops is expected."

The only gain to be hoped for is that people who would be temporarily idle in the cities may earn at least a part of their living in pleasant and healthful surroundings.

SATIATED

Charges leveled against parents are so numerous that they sometimes doubt whether they have done anything right, but there surely is some truth in the charge that they help to make their children unhappy by giving them too many luxuries and by trying to keep up with their multitudinous hopes and desires.

With countless parents it is a difficult matter to think of a gift for the children because they already have everything. Instead of giving them a piece of cake that they would have enjoyed they have placed the whole cake before them and told them to eat to their fill. Instead of bringing them out a new plaything occasionally they have opened the door to the warehouse and told them to take everything they wanted.

The result is that children have an automobile when they ought to be finding delight in a bicycle, and by the time they are grown they are bored with life. By giving them too much parents are cheating them out of a big lot of wholesome fun.

REWARDS

Some people won't do any work for the community because they see no money in it. "What will I get out of it?" they ask, if they are requested to do something on some committee. Well, there is one thing they do get when they do such work, and that is the personal appreciation of all their neighbors. The little narrow circle in which they once moved, is widened out so that everyone admires them.

And very tangible rewards come from such service too. People who give it find that others like to employ them or patronize them. The more a person gives himself to his community, the more people will root for him.

Rumor hath it that Warden Lawes of Sing Sing was offered the presidency of the New York Stock Exchange, but turned it down. After all, what could it get him socially?

If the railroads fold, the passenger public may have to paste college pennants on a suit case and thumb rides from one college campus to the next.

DAILY DOZEN

From the Medical Society of the State of Pennsylvania

Mumbo Jumbo still prevails. Especially about health.

Folk remedies seem strange.

Here are a few:

Wear a bag of asafetida.

It will prevent diphtheria.

Wear a woolen sock about neck.

It will cure a sore throat.

Amber beads prevent goiter.

Cut baby's finger nails.

Or he will grow up to steal.

Don't believe a word of it.

"Love I Dare Not" by ALLENE CORLISS

CHAPTER XXVII

Caroline came into the room wearing a simple yellow tulle frock, looking much too young and inexperienced to be connected even remotely with opening nights on Broadway. Looking at her, Alec thought, "She should be going out tonight with some boy down from New Haven . . . she should be more interested in this fall of nineteen thirty-six in football games and fraternity dances than in getting good dramatic notices in the metropolitan newspapers." And then, crossing the room, kissing the lips she lifted a little surprisedly but not unwillingly to his, he thought, "Some day, I shall have to make it up to her. . . ."

He said, "That dress is perfect but it cries for a corsage . . . we'll stop at the first florist shop and pick up some orchids."

"Not orchids. . . ." Caroline shook her head laughingly. She had had a quiet day, plenty of time to bathe and dress, and she was feeling more relaxed and optimistic about the next night than she had in weeks. "Orchids tomorrow night, perhaps, but something much less expensive and easy to live up to tonight, please."

She had thought, saying this, that he might choose gardenias or even roses . . . she was utterly unprepared for pansies.

Velvety, darkly violet, deeply gold, she held them in her hands . . . the woman in the shop in Baltimore had fastened a silver ribbon about the waist of a white chiffon dress and said, "It is lovely with pansies worn here, and silver sandals."

She caught her breath softly and her fingers clung tightly to the flowers, and Alec said, seeing she made no move to lift them from the box, "If you don't like them, I'll go back and change them but I thought they would do something to that yellow dress."

She turned her head and smiled at him and fastened the pansies to her slim waist, where they glowed darkly against the white curve of her bare arm. "They're lovely. Alec, nothing else would have been half as perfect."

She told herself later, when she saw Tommy Gale coming toward them table at the supper club where Alec took her, that she had known all the time that this would happen. That somehow, somewhere, that evening, she would see him. She had known it really, the moment her fingers had lifted those dark-eyed flowers from their box and fastened them against her waist, just below her heart. . . .

She had known, too, that seeing him like this would do just what it was doing to her . . . but she hadn't known that she would be able to conceal so completely her agitation from everyone . . . especially from Roxanne Talbot who she saw now was clinging to Tommy's arm. At first she hadn't seen her at all. At first, she had seen only Tommy Gale with his ruffled dark head and incredibly blue eyes. . . .

He was saying, "You remember Miss Talbot, don't you, Caroline?" "Yes," said Caroline steadily, "the Plaza, wasn't it? Last fall?"

Roxanne said it was so "sweet" of Caroline to remember her. She said she was "thrilled" to meet Alec, at last. She said it was "gorgeous" running into both of them like this.

Alec ordered champagne. When it arrived he said, "Let's drink to my new play . . . and to Caroline's success in it. . . ."

Alec was tall and unbelievably handsome in a white tie and tails. Roxanne Talbot's slim sophistication was sheathed in black satin, her scarlet-tipped fingers clung lightly to Tommy's arm. Tommy's eyes were on Alec. He said, "No, let's drink to you and Caroline . . . and to all your years together. . . ."

His voice, as he gave the toast, was properly festive. Only his mouth forgot to smile.

The orchestra slid smoothly from a new dance tune into one that had been popular the year before. Tommy said, "Dance this with me, Caroline," and looked directly at her for the first time.

She walked into his arms, a slender girl in a yellow tulle frock, pansies clinging to her slim waist. She looked into his arms and he bent his head until his cheek touched her forehead. Like this they had danced that other November . . . in this same music . . . in this same room. . . .

And his arms had held her no more tenderly then than they did now. Or had they? She didn't know. For the moment she didn't care. All that mattered was that the music shouldn't stop. That it should go on forever. That she should go on forever in his arms.

But no dance goes on forever . . . and every moment no matter how sweetly, closely shared must eventually end.

The music stopped with a soft crash, she swayed a little against him for a second his hand touched her arm. In that second, she lifted her eyes and looked directly at him.

Somehow, he managed to smile at her. With tremendous detachment. Somehow he managed to say in an utterly casual voice, "Nice dance, wasn't it? Swell music in this joint. Roxanne and I come here whenever I can afford it."

In this way, with these words, did he succeed in annihilating superbly the sweet exigency of the past few minutes. In this way did he deny it had ever existed at all.

She nodded. Her throat felt dry and stiff and suddenly she was cold all over—with a terrible coldness that struck clear through her bones. She thought, "I'm such a fool. . . . I'm no better than an idiot, really. I was just a dance to him . . . a sort of duty dance."

Roxanne's hand reached out possessively when they returned. She rose at once, slipping her arm through Tommy's, letting it lie white and relaxed and slim against the black broadcloth of his coat sleeve. "Thanks for the champagne and the best of luck to both of you tomorrow night . . . it is tomorrow night, isn't it?"

Alec said yes, it was. He said he could arrange for two seats if Tommy could use them. Tommy said thanks, that would be swell.

Then Roxanne's arm slid from Tommy's coat sleeve up around his neck and they were just one more couple dancing in the swinging eye of a baby spotlight, and Caroline and Alec were alone again . . . only four empty champagne glasses left to prove that they had ever been anything else.

Alec said, "Suddenly you look very tired, sweet . . . want to shove away?"

She looked at him strangely for a moment. Then she said, "I've made a mistake, Alec. . . . I can't marry you . . . ever. . . ."

He caught her hand and held tightly. "You are tired, angel . . . I hadn't realized." And signaled a waiter to bring the check.

But in the cab on the way home, she came back to it. Sitting very erect, her eyes staring straight ahead of her, she said: "I meant that, Alec . . . about not marrying you. . . ."

He put his arms around her and held her as he would a frightened and distraught child. He thought,

The Great Game of Politics

proportion when compared to the complacency with which Administration circles acquiesce in the connection of Mr. James Roosevelt with the insurance business. The firm is Roosevelt & Sargent. It sells all kinds of insurance and young Mr. Roosevelt is the senior partner.

IT HAS been repeatedly printed in publications of national circulation that in four years young Mr. Roosevelt had accumulated $500,000 as his share of the firm's profits. Since about a year ago, when he became his father's secretary, it is stated, he has ceased to be an active partner, but continues his membership and has a revenue from this source around $150,000 a year. This means that in two more years, and before he is 33 years of age, he will have made a fortune of a million dollars, which could not have been made but for his connection with the White House. Not long ago in a syndicated column, a list of Mr. Roosevelt's larger clients was published. They included the names of many well-known "economic royalists," nearly all of whom have business—and a good deal of business—with the Government.

NOW friends of young Mr. Roosevelt say there is nothing wrong about this; that he sells his insurance policies on their merits and not with any promises to use his influence or position in the Government; that he has a right to make a living, even if his father is President of the United States—and so on. They admit that no one connected with the White House ever did this sort of thing before, but contend that it is only members of the New Deal who find fault with it. This may all be true, but it does not explain the speed with which Mr. Russell was thrown out on his ear by his HOLC chief and denounced in Congress for "scandalous and disgraceful" abuse of his position, while young Mr. Roosevelt, holding a far more influential governmental position, serenely continues to profit from his insurance business and is practically immune from criticism.

MR. RUSSELL denies that he is a partner of the lawyer he recommends or was to share in the fees resulting from his practice. But, even if he were an inactive partner participating in the profits of the firm, it is a little difficult to see why he should be separated from the pay roll and severely denounced while the other young man, bathing in the White House glamour, functions as Assistant President and becomes wealthy on the income of his outside business interests. And, so far as propriety is concerned, it isn't easy to see any real difference between the two cases. If one is scandalous why isn't the other? To a detached observer, they seem to be pretty much on a par except that the standard of ethics in matters of this sort ought to be a little higher in the White House than anywhere else.

GRAND

A new era dawns! Gangsterism, as a theme for motion pictures, has finally reached the stage where it can be kidded.

That's what happens in "A Slight Case of Murder," a gaily hilarious burlesque from the studios of Warner Bros., which won howls of laughter from audience at the Grand Theatre yesterday, when it had its first local showing.

Curiously, the star of this farce is the same man who first established the gangster-racketeer as a familiar screen figure—Edward G. Robinson, who years ago was the menacing "Little Caesar" and who carried on through various underworld pictures right down to "Bullets or Ballots" and the recent "Kid Galahad" and "The Last Gangster."

There are shootings in "A Slight Case of Murder," of course. In fact, four gangsters of various degrees of wickedness bite the dust. But the killings are so ludicrous that they bring laughs instead of gasps.
